Sojourner Truth women's rights activist and abolitionist

Catherine Bernard.

"The women's suffrage movement received support from several key abolitionists. One was the freed slave and antislavery advocate who called herself Sojourner Truth. Through sources, images, and ... narrative, students will learn that in addition to Truth's impassion to end slavery, she also fought for women's rights, speaking to the crowds at suffrage ga during the 1850s and until her death"--Provided by publisher.

most farmers in the North had small farms where they grew just enough for themselves and their families. The North was also developing an economy based on trade and industry, rather than agriculture alone. For these reasons, and because the North had thousands of immigrants arriving each year to work in the cities, slaveholders' excuses for upholding slavery were no longer valid. Many Northern states were taking steps to get rid of it entirely.

According to the New York state legislature, all slaves born after July 4, 1799, were "free." However, they had to remain as unpaid servants until the age of twenty-nine for boys, and twenty-four for girls.⁴ Because Isabella was born before 1799, only her children fell within the law. In 1817, all that changed. Under a new law passed by New York State, all slaves over the age of twenty-eight were to be freed by July 4, 1827. For Isabella, this new law meant that she would be a free woman in ten more years.

Slavery was phased out in New York when its economy became dominated by industry and trade. Goods were shipped in and out of its busy ports daily.
